DANIEL BOONE

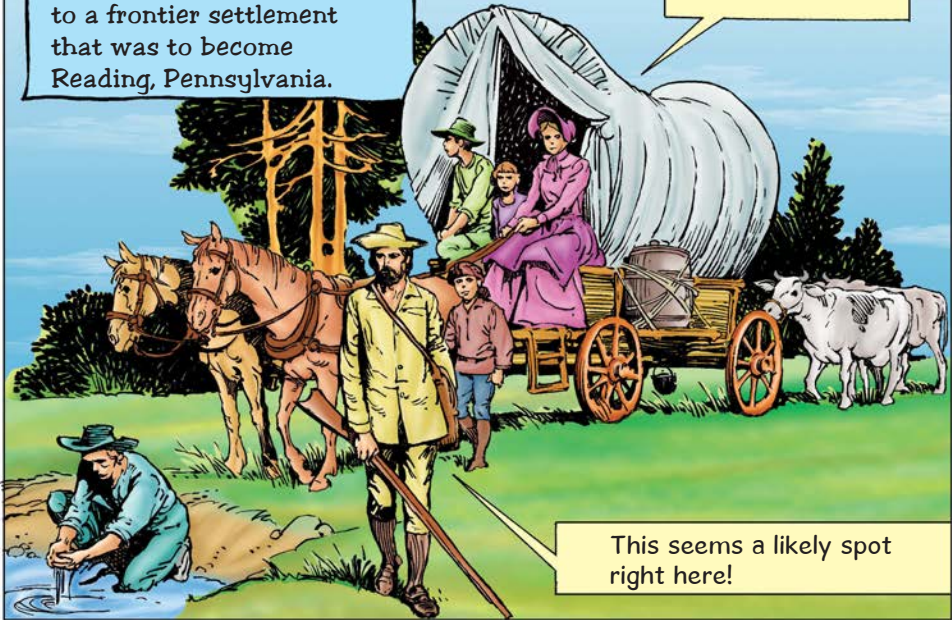

Once, when he was surrounded by Native Americans on three sides, Daniel Boone escaped by jumping from a sixty-foot cliff.

He lived all his life in new territory. He was captured many times. He escaped many times. It was no miracle. Both his skill as a woodsman and his character as a man, helped him to survive when many others died.

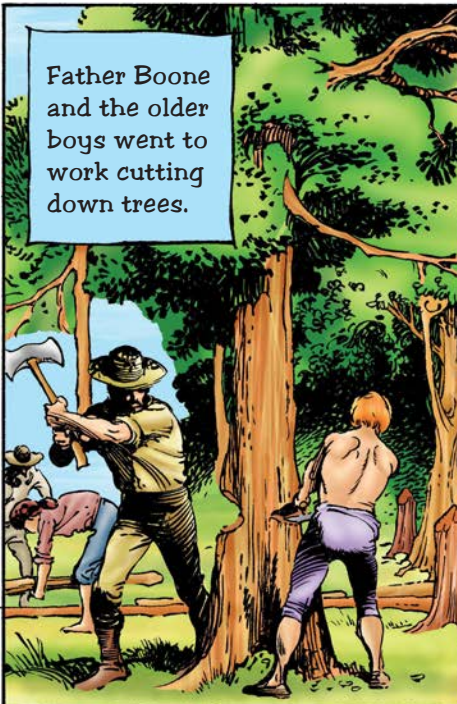

When Daniel was three years old, his family moved to a frontier settlement that was to become Reading, Pennsylvania.

Where's our new place going to be?

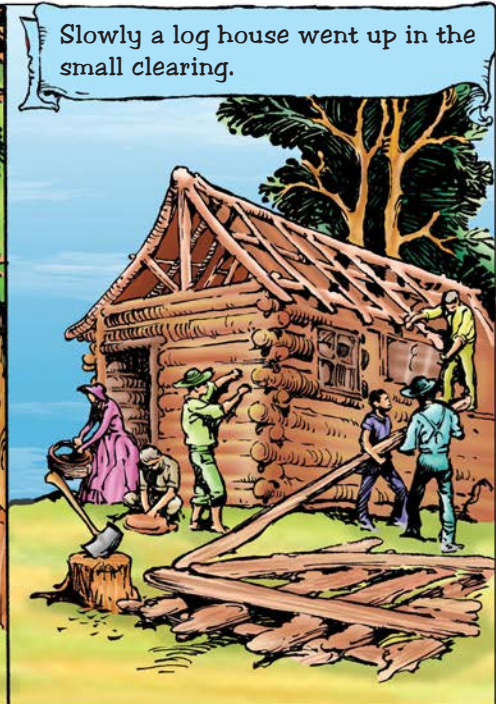

This seems a likely spot right here!

Father Boone and the older boys went to work cutting down trees.

Slowly a log house went up in the small clearing.

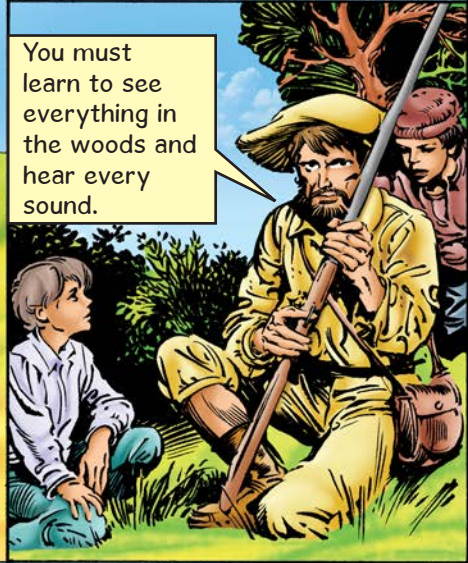

The ground was plowed and a crop planted.

It was the job of the younger children to find the cows in the woods and bring them in at night.

You must learn to see everything in the woods and hear every sound.

Most Native Americans hereabouts are peaceful. But in case you see one, slip away like a shadow.

And you must move softly, without noise yourself.

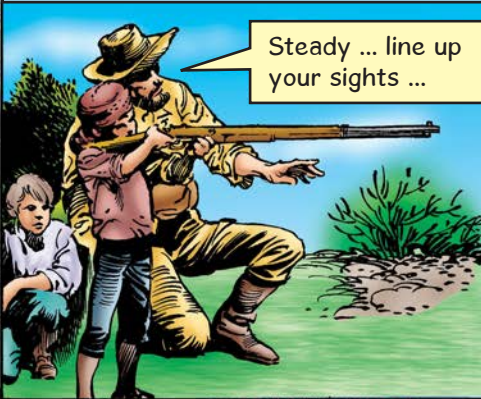

You must notice the sun or the moon and stars—the wind direction—a dead tree—everything—so when you've found the cows, you can find your way home again!

These lessons were fun ... but also a matter of life and death. Daniel learned them all.

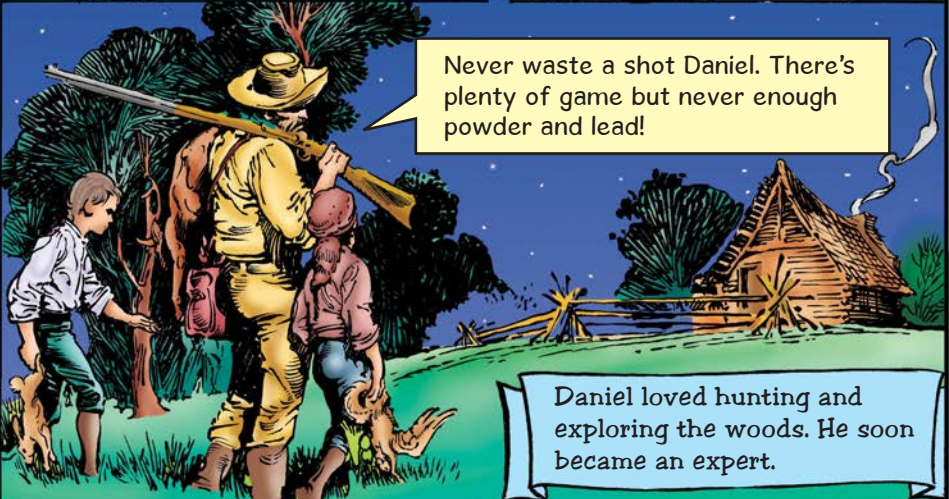

As soon as a boy could hold a rifle, he was taught to shoot.

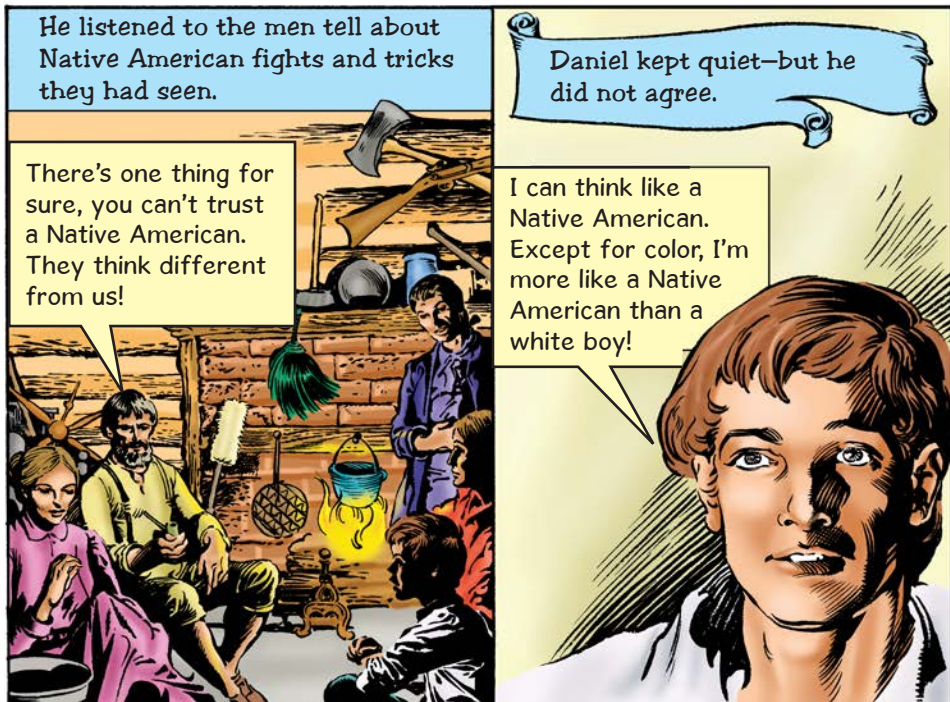

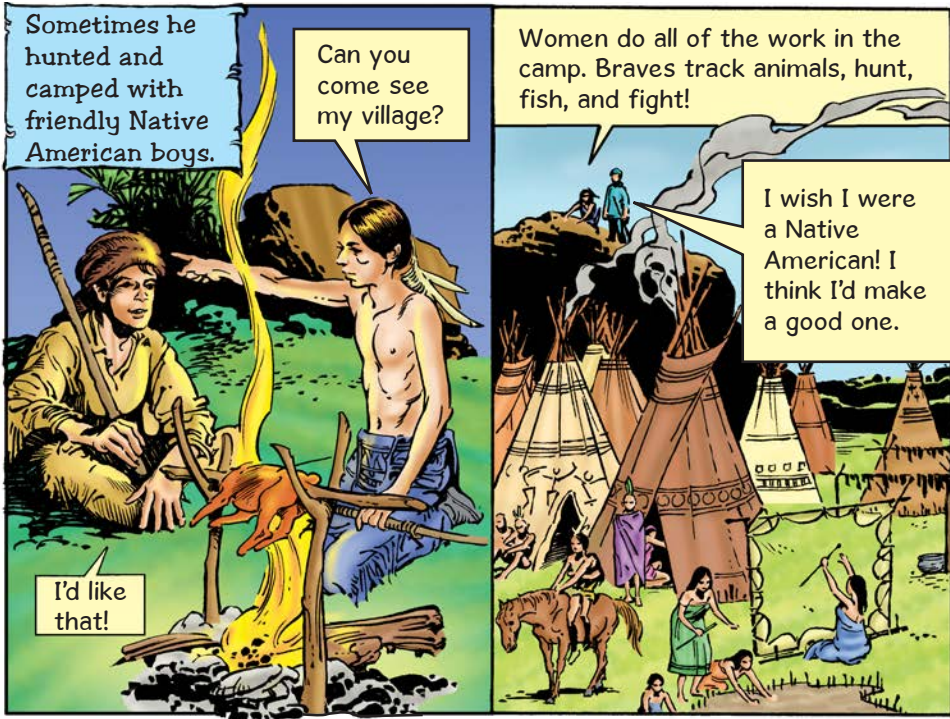

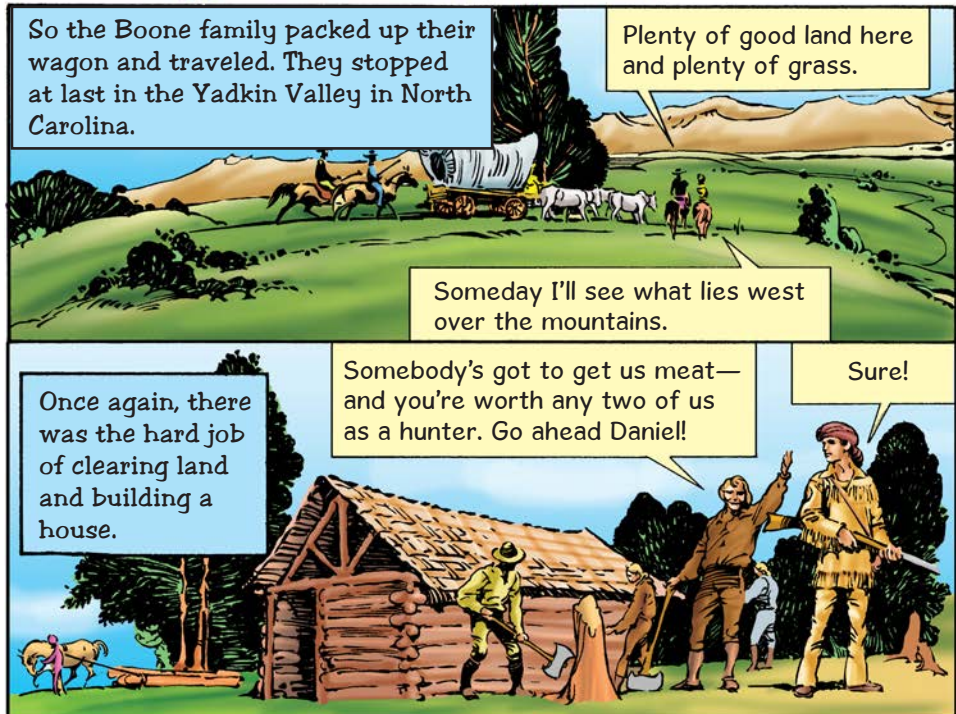

Then he learned to hunt.

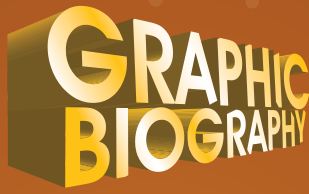

Never waste a shot Daniel. There's plenty of game but never enough powder and lead!
